Diary

Lisa Guennifa, 29, gets paid to spend her days seeking out good-looking professional men. It's a part of her role as matchmaker for the Elect Club, the London-based introduction agency. Here she spills the beans on her typical working week

MONDAY

TO START the week I'm heading to The Royal Exchange, London's most exclusive shopping emporium to man-hunt with Haley (Haley Hill, an ex-pharmacist who founded Elect Club in 2005). We have two or three female members looking for City types so it's our job to find them here in the Square Mile. From my vantage point in the central bar at the Exchange I spot a tall, friendly-looking man in his mid-30s coming out of the Gucci store. He enters the bar and, once he's ordered his drink, I introduce myself.

I explain that I work for Elect, give him my card and ask if he's single.

Like most men I approach, he's flattered but tells me he's married, although he has a single friend who might contact us. I always ask men if they are single and keep an eye out for wedding rings. I've never approached a man who's not straight as I must have an effective

"women-hunt" as ladies are more receptive to being approached by a man because it's more flattering

TUESDAY

RATHER than being tied to an office, Elect consultants are self-employed. We work flexible hours from home and from Adam Street, a private members club in central London, a great venue for meeting because it's private and glamorous.

I arrive at Adam Street after lunch for my first consultation of the day. When John arrives he takes my breath away. He's 38 and the CEO of a PR company. He is tall, dark-haired and has a beautiful face.

Lots of members are gorgeous but I'm never tempted to chat them up for myself. I've never spent more than a month as a singleton and was in a relationship with Will, 27, who works in TV and film production, when I started work with Elect.
